

This public information brochure is a synopsis of various research materials related to the Site of Camp Douglas, prepared for the Commission on Chicago Historical and Architectural Landmarks by its staff.

CITY OF CHICAGO
Richard J. Daley, Mayor

COMMISSION ON CHICAGO HISTORICAL AND ARCHITECTURAL LANDMARKS

Samuel A. Lichtmann, Chairman
Barnet Hodes, Vice-Chairman
Ira J. Bach, Secretary
John W. Baird
Joseph Benson
Jerome R. Butler, Jr.
Ruth Moore Garbe
Lewis W. Hill
Harold K. Skramstad, Jr.

William M. McLenahan, Director
Room 800
320 North Clark Street
Chicago, Illinois 60610
(312) 744-3200

1864 drawing of Camp Douglas. (Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

Site of CAMP DOUGLAS

A military and prisoner of war camp during the Civil War, Camp Douglas was in existence from September, 1861 until April, 1865. It covered a 60-acre area which was generally bounded on the north by East 31st Street and East 31st Place, on the east by South Cottage Grove Avenue, on the south by East 33rd Street and East 33rd Place, and on the west by South Giles Avenue.

Originally a military training and recruitment center, Camp Douglas became a prison camp for Confederate prisoners in February, 1862. During its three years of operation as a prison camp, approximately 30,000 prisoners were housed there. Camp Douglas was the largest of four such camps in the Midwest.

The overall physical appearance of Camp Douglas can generally be described as bleak. There were approximately 156 buildings on the site, most of them poorly constructed wooden barracks, and a large open area or "yard," surrounded by a twelve-foot wooden stockade fence. An irregular boundary, interrupted by two gates, enclosed the camp.

The camp was named in honor of Senator Stephen A. Douglas and situated on part of his estate, "Oakenwald." After serving as a member of the Illinois House of Representatives (1836-37), as Illinois Secretary of State (1840-

41), and as judge of the Illinois Supreme Court (1841-47), Douglas became a U. S. Senator from Illinois. In 1858, he was opposed by Abraham Lincoln for the Senate seat, and was challenged by Lincoln to the seven historic Lincoln-Douglas debates.

The debates received national attention and initially were viewed as somewhat of a mismatch. Senator Douglas had a reputation for his suave manner and his skill as a debater, while his challenger, Lincoln, provided a striking contrast with his ill-fitting clothes, high-pitched voice, and apparent discomfort with public speaking. Lincoln's appearance, however, belied his ability as a debater. The debates focused on the growing split in the nation, rather than on local issues. Slavery was a key issue, with Lincoln arguing for federal legislation against slavery in any of the territories, and Douglas arguing that while the federal government could outlaw slavery there, it would be abolished, in reality, only by the vote of the people in territorial legislatures. Douglas defeated Lincoln for the Senate seat, either as a result of, or in spite of, the debates. Douglas's loyalty to the notion of popular sovereignty, that is, the right of the people to decide, had a powerful appeal in Illinois and probably influenced the outcome of the election.

In 1860, Lincoln and Douglas were again to run for the same political office, this time the presidency. Lincoln was nominated by the Republicans at a convention held in the Chicago hall known as the Wigwag. Douglas was the Democratic candidate. Two other candidates served to split the Democratic vote and Lincoln won the election.

After the Confederate attack on Fort Sumter, on April 12, 1861, which began the Civil War, both the Union and the Confederacy began to build up their armies. To this end, Cook and the other northern counties of Illinois were designated by Governor Richard Yates as the "Northern Military District of Illinois." By this same order, a military camp for the new district, Camp Douglas, was constructed in Chicago for the collection, consolidation, instruction, and equipment of volunteer troops under the supervision of the governor. Chicago, as a major rail center, was a logical place for a training camp. Over 31 regiments and batteries, numbering about 25,000 men, were trained at Camp Douglas during the year that it served as a military camp.

The camp's use changed in February, 1862. On February 11, the regiments stationed at Camp Douglas had been ordered to the field, leaving the camp nearly empty. Following the capture of Fort Donelson, Tennessee, by Ulysses S. Grant on February 16, between 8,000 and 9,000 Confederate prisoners were sent to the camp.

No one at the camp was prepared to handle the large influx of prisoners. In the first months of the war, the Union had won battles and Confederate prisoners were captured, but there had been little planning as to the housing of these prisoners. Chicago's mayor, Julian S. Rumsey, complained:

There is not even a fence around the barracks and many were afraid that the prisoners would break out and attack the city. Authorities at the camp were faced with many problems, as what had been a camp of healthy and vigorous recruits was now a camp of sick and ragged prisoners. Poor planning led to poor conditions at the camp. Many of the prisoners were sick or wounded on

This drawing of Camp Douglas was made in 1862 after the camp's use had been changed from an induction and training camp for

Union soldiers to a prisoner of war camp for Confederate soldiers. (Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

Soon after its conversion to a prisoner of war camp, Camp Douglas experienced a great influx of Confederate prisoners. The photograph above shows these prisoners in the yard of the camp. Note the variations in the prisoner's uniforms and the wooden barracks in the background.
(Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

arrival and poorly clothed, thus multiplying the problem.

Historian E. B. Long, in an article in the June, 1970, issue of Chicago History, described the administration of Camp Douglas as a:

Dreary tale, replete with problems of sanitation (there never was an adequate sewer system), sometimes poor food and inadequate clothing, appalling housing conditions, lack of funds, inept and inaccurate keeping of records, confused leadership and oftentimes cruel discipline. This situation seemed to be the rule for Civil War prison camps on both sides.

A factor which, to some extent, improved conditions at the camp was public sympathy. The camp was frequently visited by Chicagoans, many of whom were concerned over the welfare of the prisoners. Collections were taken in churches and medicines were sent to the camp by the wagonload. A "Relief Committee of Citizens" was organized, and druggists were employed to aid the post surgeon.

Contemporary accounts, however, show that this was not enough. Sir Henry Morton Stanley, an Englishman who in his youth fought for the Confederacy, was a prisoner at Camp Douglas. He described conditions at the camp in a later narrative as follows:

Our prison pen was like a cattle-yard...The Southerners' uniforms were never pretty, but when rotten and ragged, and swarming with vermin, they heightened the disreputability of the wearers; and, if anything was needed to increase our dejection after sweeping glances of the arid mud-soil of the great yard...Left to ourselves, with absolutely nothing to do but to brood over our positions, bewail our lots, catch the taint of disease from each other, and passively abide in our prison-pen, we were soon in a fair state of rotting while yet alive.

Stanley survived his internment at Camp Douglas and went on to become a journalist, most noted for his expedition to Africa where he found the missionary David Livingston.

In July, 1862, escapes were on the increase. Although cases of dysentery were evident in August, authorities were unable to correct the sanitary conditions. Overcrowding was a serious problem. During 1864, conditions in the camp further deteriorated. In May, because of pressure from Washington, rations were reduced. Candles were no longer issued because it was believed that the prisoners would use them to light the way while digging escape tunnels. By the fall, death and illness increased and some 1,156 prisoners died by the end of the year.

The same year, 1864, was also the year of the 'Chicago Conspiracy,' a movement designed by Southern sympathizers to free the 8,352 prisoners at Camp Douglas and start an insurrection in Illinois and Indiana and thus split the Union. A plot was uncovered in August, reinforcements were mobilized to aid the guards at the camp, and it failed.

This row of wooden barracks known as "Washerwomen's row" was moved from the site of the camp to 746-54 East 37th Street. The

Another attempt was made that year to coincide with the presidential election on November 8. A. T. Andreas's History of Chicago notes that, according to the confessions of rebel officers and others, the design was:

To attack Camp Douglas, to release the prisoners there, with them to seize the polls, allowing none but the Copperhead ticket to be voted, and stuff the boxes sufficiently to secure the City, County and State for [Lincoln's opponent George B.] McClellan and [his running mate George H.] Pendleton; then to utterly sack the city, burning and destroying every description of property, except what they could appropriate for their own use and that of their Southern brethren—to lay the city waste and carry off its money and stores to Jefferson Davis's dominions.

Despite the even smaller garrison—Camp Douglas now had only 736 men to guard the 8,000 captives—General Joseph B. Sweet, the camp's commandant, took quick action. He arrested the key plotters, seized their arms, and broke up the plot.

The war ended in April, 1865, following Lee's surrender to Grant at Appomattox. By the beginning of August, buildings were demolished in 1940.

(Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

practically all the 12,000 prisoners then in the camp, with the exception of a few hundred who were very ill, had sworn allegiance to the government and were released. Union regiments used the camp as a demobilization center for a short time, until the camp no longer served any useful purpose.

In November, 1865, the sale of government property began. Barracks and fences in the camp were pulled down and the lumber sold. The other buildings were sold at auction to the highest bidder. A single row of barracks was moved from the site of the camp to 746-54 East 37th Street. These were demolished in 1940.

Although nothing remains of Camp Douglas today, the tomb of Senator Douglas stands, marked by an impressive monument completed in 1881, in a small park near the site of the camp. To the south of this is St. Joseph's Carondelet Child Center, a part of which was constructed in 1864 and was used as a home for sick and disabled Civil War veterans. Both are in the area of 35th Street and Cottage Grove Avenue and serve to remind Chicagoans of the role that Chicago and Camp Douglas played in the Civil War.

The photograph above shows that the site of Camp Douglas today gives no hint of the camp's existence. A modern high-rise development, shopping center and a school cover the camp's site.

This public information brochure is a synopsis of various research materials related to the Site of Camp Douglas, prepared for the Commission on Chicago Historical and Architectural Landmarks by its staff.

CITY OF CHICAGO
Richard J. Daley, Mayor

COMMISSION ON CHICAGO HISTORICAL
AND ARCHITECTURAL LANDMARKS

Samuel A. Lichtmann, Chairman
Barnet Hodes, Vice-Chairman
Ira J. Bach, Secretary
John W. Baird
Joseph Benson
Jerome R. Butler, Jr.
Ruth Moore Garbe
Lewis W. Hill
Harold K. Skramstad, Jr.

William M. McLenahan, Director
Room 800
320 North Clark Street
Chicago, Illinois 60610
(312) 744-3200

1864 drawing of Camp Douglas. (Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

Site of CAMP DOUGLAS

A military and prisoner of war camp during the Civil War, Camp Douglas was in existence from September, 1861 until April, 1865. It covered a 60-acre area which was generally bounded on the north by East 31st Street and East 31st Place, on the east by South Cottage Grove Avenue, on the south by East 33rd Street and East 33rd Place, and on the west by South Giles Avenue.

Originally a military training and recruitment center, Camp Douglas became a prison camp for Confederate prisoners in February, 1862. During its three years of operation as a prison camp, approximately 30,000 prisoners were housed there. Camp Douglas was the largest of four such camps in the Midwest.

The overall physical appearance of Camp Douglas can generally be described as bleak. There were approximately 156 buildings on the site, most of them poorly constructed wooden barracks, and a large open area or "yard," surrounded by a twelve-foot wooden stockade fence. An irregular boundary, interrupted by two gates, enclosed the camp.

The camp was named in honor of Senator Stephen A. Douglas and situated on part of his estate, "Oakenwald." After serving as a member of the Illinois House of Representatives (1836-37), as Illinois Secretary of State (1840-

41), and as judge of the Illinois Supreme Court (1841-47), Douglas became a U. S. Senator from Illinois. In 1858, he was opposed by Abraham Lincoln for the Senate seat, and was challenged by Lincoln to the seven historic Lincoln-Douglas debates.

The debates received national attention and initially were viewed as somewhat of a mismatch. Senator Douglas had a reputation for his suave manner and his skill as a debater, while his challenger, Lincoln, provided a striking contrast with his ill-fitting clothes, high-pitched voice, and apparent discomfort with public speaking. Lincoln's appearance, however, belied his ability as a debater. The debates focused on the growing split in the nation, rather than on local issues. Slavery was a key issue, with Lincoln arguing for federal legislation against slavery in any of the territories, and Douglas arguing that while the federal government could outlaw slavery there, it would be abolished, in reality, only by the vote of the people in territorial legislatures. Douglas defeated Lincoln for the Senate seat, either as a result of, or in spite of, the debates. Douglas's loyalty to the notion of popular sovereignty, that is, the right of the people to decide, had a powerful appeal in Illinois and probably influenced the outcome of the election.

In 1860, Lincoln and Douglas were again to run for the same political office, this time the presidency. Lincoln was nominated by the Republicans at a convention held in the Chicago hall known as the Wigwag. Douglas was the Democratic candidate. Two other candidates served to split the Democratic vote and Lincoln won the election.

After the Confederate attack on Fort Sumter, on April 12, 1861, which began the Civil War, both the Union and the Confederacy began to build up their armies. To this end, Cook and the other northern counties of Illinois were designated by Governor Richard Yates as the "Northern Military District of Illinois." By this same order, a military camp for the new district, Camp Douglas, was constructed in Chicago for the collection, consolidation, instruction, and equipment of volunteer troops under the supervision of the governor. Chicago, as a major rail center, was a logical place for a training camp. Over 31 regiments and batteries, numbering about 25,000 men, were trained at Camp Douglas during the year that it served as a military camp.

The camp's use changed in February, 1862. On February 11, the regiments stationed at Camp Douglas had been ordered to the field, leaving the camp nearly empty. Following the capture of Fort Donelson, Tennessee, by Ulysses S. Grant on February 16, between 8,000 and 9,000 Confederate prisoners were sent to the camp.

No one at the camp was prepared to handle the large influx of prisoners. In the first months of the war, the Union had won battles and Confederate prisoners were captured, but there had been little planning as to the housing of these prisoners. Chicago's mayor, Julian S. Rumsey, complained:

There is not even a fence around the barracks and many were afraid that the prisoners would break out and attack the city. Authorities at the camp were faced with many problems, as what had been a camp of healthy and vigorous recruits was now a camp of sick and ragged prisoners. Poor planning led to poor conditions at the camp. Many of the prisoners were sick or wounded on

This drawing of Camp Douglas was made in 1862 after the camp's use had been changed from an induction and training camp for

Union soldiers to a prisoner of war camp for Confederate soldiers. (Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

Soon after its conversion to a prisoner of war camp, Camp Douglas experienced a great influx of Confederate prisoners. The photograph above shows these prisoners in the yard of the camp. Note the variations in the prisoner's uniforms and the wooden barracks in the background.
(Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

arrival and poorly clothed, thus multiplying the problem.

Historian E. B. Long, in an article in the June, 1970, issue of Chicago History, described the administration of Camp Douglas as a:

Dreary tale, replete with problems of sanitation (there never was an adequate sewer system), sometimes poor food and inadequate clothing, appalling housing conditions, lack of funds, inept and inaccurate keeping of records, confused leadership and oftentimes cruel discipline. This situation seemed to be the rule for Civil War prison camps on both sides.

A factor which, to some extent, improved conditions at the camp was public sympathy. The camp was frequently visited by Chicagoans, many of whom were concerned over the welfare of the prisoners. Collections were taken in churches and medicines were sent to the camp by the wagonload. A "Relief Committee of Citizens" was organized, and druggists were employed to aid the post surgeon.

Contemporary accounts, however, show that this was not enough. Sir Henry Morton Stanley, an Englishman who in his youth fought for the Confederacy, was a prisoner at Camp Douglas. He described conditions at the camp in a later narrative as follows:

Our prison pen was like a cattle-yard...The Southerners' uniforms were never pretty, but when rotten and ragged, and swarming with vermin, they heightened the disreputability of the wearers; and, if anything was needed to increase our dejection after sweeping glances of the arid mud-soil of the great yard...Left to ourselves, with absolutely nothing to do but to brood over our positions, bewail our lots, catch the taint of disease from each other, and passively abide in our prison-pen, we were soon in a fair state of rotting while yet alive.

Stanley survived his internment at Camp Douglas and went on to become a journalist, most noted for his expedition to Africa where he found the missionary David Livingston.

In July, 1862, escapes were on the increase. Although cases of dysentery were evident in August, authorities were unable to correct the sanitary conditions. Overcrowding was a serious problem. During 1864, conditions in the camp further deteriorated. In May, because of pressure from Washington, rations were reduced. Candles were no longer issued because it was believed that the prisoners would use them to light the way while digging escape tunnels. By the fall, death and illness increased and some 1,156 prisoners died by the end of the year.

The same year, 1864, was also the year of the 'Chicago Conspiracy,' a movement designed by Southern sympathizers to free the 8,352 prisoners at Camp Douglas and start an insurrection in Illinois and Indiana and thus split the Union. A plot was uncovered in August, reinforcements were mobilized to aid the guards at the camp, and it failed.

Another attempt was made that year to coincide with the presidential election on November 8. A. T. Andreas's History of Chicago notes that, according to the confessions of rebel officers and others, the design was:

To attack Camp Douglas, to release the prisoners there, with them to seize the polls, allowing none but the Copperhead ticket to be voted, and stuff the boxes sufficiently to secure the City, County and State for [Lincoln's opponent George B.] McClellan and [his running mate George H.] Pendleton; then to utterly sack the city, burning and destroying every description of property, except what they could appropriate for their own use and that of their Southern brethren—to lay the city waste and carry off its money and stores to Jefferson Davis's dominions.

Despite the even smaller garrison—Camp Douglas now had only 736 men to guard the 8,000 captives—General Joseph B. Sweet, the camp's commandant, took quick action. He arrested the key plotters, seized their arms, and broke up the plot.

The war ended in April, 1865, following Lee's surrender to Grant at Appomattox. By the beginning of August,

This row of wooden barracks known as "Washerwomen's row" was moved from the site of the camp to 746-54 East 37th Street. The buildings were demolished in 1940.

(Courtesy of the Chicago Historical Society)

practically all the 12,000 prisoners then in the camp, with the exception of a few hundred who were very ill, had sworn allegiance to the government and were released. Union regiments used the camp as a demobilization center for a short time, until the camp no longer served any useful purpose.

In November, 1865, the sale of government property began. Barracks and fences in the camp were pulled down and the lumber sold. The other buildings were sold at auction to the highest bidder. A single row of barracks was moved from the site of the camp to 746-54 East 37th Street. These were demolished in 1940.

Although nothing remains of Camp Douglas today, the tomb of Senator Douglas stands, marked by an impressive monument completed in 1881, in a small park near the site of the camp. To the south of this is St. Joseph's Carondelet Child Center, a part of which was constructed in 1864 and was used as a home for sick and disabled Civil War veterans. Both are in the area of 35th Street and Cottage Grove Avenue and serve to remind Chicagoans of the role that Chicago and Camp Douglas played in the Civil War.

The photograph above shows that the site of Camp Douglas today gives no hint of the camp's existence. A modern high-rise development, shopping center and a school cover the camp's site.